You Are Responsible for Your Own Success

"Success is determined by our willingness to achieve and the spirit upon which we assume risk and responsibility." Jan DeLory

Success is defined in very individual and personal ways. Some people define success financially, some by the success of their children, some by professional title and status, and some by material items such as the size of the house or the brand of the car sitting in the driveway.

However, success by whatever definition is often elusive because of our 'willingness to achieve.' We often hear team members, employees, family members, or friends say they wanted to achieve something: make more money, buy a new car, earn a promotion, and they never seem to move towards it. Willingness to achieve means doing what is necessary and having the appropriate attitudes to drive the required activity to move you towards your desired success. Developing and maintaining appropriate attitudes takes courage, the courage to think and behave differently in order to achieve different results. When obstacles present themselves, and the willingness to do the hard work is not there, the goal gets lowered or changed rather than the person working on the next best solution to overcoming the obstacle. Many times we are the biggest
